The Byzantine Empire

How did the Byzantine Empire develop and form its own distinctive church?

Introduction

In 330 c.e., the emperor Constantine moved his capital from Rome to the city of Byzantium.

At its peak, the great Byzantine Empire controlled land in three continents: Europe, Asia, and Africa. This vast empire lasted from about 500 to 1453 C.E., when it was conquered by the Ottoman Turks.

At first, the Byzantine Empire was the continuation of the Roman Empire in the east. In 330 C.E., the Roman emperor Constantine moved his capital from Rome to the city of Byzantium, an old Greek trading colony on the eastern edge of Europe. Constantine called his capital New Rome, but it soon became known as Constantinople, which is Greek for “Constantine’s City.”

Later, control of the huge original empire was divided between two emperors—one based in Rome and one based in Constantinople. After the fall of Rome, the eastern empire continued for another 1,000 years. We call this the Byzantine Empire, after Byzantium, the original name of its capital city.

The eastern and western parts of the original empire remained connected for a time through a shared Christian faith. However, the Church in the east developed in its own unique ways. It became known as the Eastern Orthodox Church. Over time, Byzantine emperors and Church officials came into conflict with the pope in Rome, which eventually led to a permanent split between the Eastern Orthodox Church and the Roman Catholic Church.

In this lesson, you will learn about the Byzantine Empire, one of its greatest emperors, its distinctive church, and rising conflict between the east and the west. Let’s begin by exploring the empire’s capital—the fabulous city of Constantinople.

1. Constantinople

Constantinople was more than 800 miles to the east of Rome. Why did Constantine choose this site to be the capital of the Roman Empire? One reason was that the site was surrounded by water on three sides, making it easy to defend. The Byzantines fashioned a chain across the city’s harbor to guard against seafaring intruders. Miles of walls, fortified by watchtowers, and gates discouraged invasion by land and by sea. This kept Constantinople largely protected from possible future invasions.

Constantinople also stood at the crossroads of Europe and Asia, and the many sea and overland trade routes linking east and west. During the Byzantine Empire, this ideal location helped to make the city, and some of its citizens, very wealthy. For more than 700 years, Constantinople was the richest and the most elegant city in the Mediterranean region. Ivory, silk, furs, perfumes, and other luxury items flowed through its markets. A French soldier who saw the city in 1204 exclaimed, “One could not believe there was so rich a city in all the world.”

At its height, Constantinople was home to around one million people. The city’s language and culture were Greek, but traders and visitors spoke many languages. Ships crowded the city’s harbor, loaded with goods. The city streets, some narrow and twisting, some grand and broad, teemed with camel and mule trains.

Life in Constantinople was more comfortable than in western Europe. The city boasted a sewer system, which was quite rare in medieval times. Social services were provided by hospitals, homes for the elderly, and orphanages.

Despite the luxuries enjoyed by the rich, many people lived in poverty. The emperor gave bread to those who could not find work, but in exchange, the unemployed performed tasks such as sweeping the streets and weeding public gardens.

Almost everyone attended the exciting chariot races at a stadium called the Hippodrome. Two chariot teams, one wearing blue and the other green, were fierce rivals. In Constantinople and other cities, many people belonged to opposing groups called the Blues and Greens after the chariot teams.

At times, the rivalry between the Blues and Greens erupted in deadly street fighting. But in 532, the two groups united in a rebellion that destroyed much of Constantinople. You will find out what happened in the next section.
The eastern Roman Empire, later called the Byzantine Empire, ruled much of the Mediterranean world for several hundred years. Constantinople served as a rich and flourishing city for over 700 years.

2. The Reign of Justinian I

One of the greatest Byzantine emperors was Justinian I, whose long reign lasted from 527 to 565. But Justinian’s reign nearly came to an abrupt end much sooner. In January 532, the emperor and his wife, Theodora, were attending chariot races at the Hippodrome. In the past, Blues and Greens among the spectators often battled each other. This time, however, both groups were dismayed over the recent arrests of some of their members. To Justinian’s horror, they united in denouncing him. Fighting broke out, spilled into the streets, and escalated into a full-scale rebellion.
During a revolt in Constantinople, the empress Theodora (third from the left) encouraged her husband, Justinian I, to stay and fight for his city. After the rebellion, Justinian I worked to rebuild the city and create a systematic body of law, which became the basis for many other legal codes.

The rioting continued for a week while Justinian and Theodora hid in the palace. Much of the city was in flames, and Justinian’s advisors wanted him to flee. Theodora, however, urged him to stay and fight. With her encouragement, Justinian put down the revolt. According to the official court historian, Procopius, 30,000 people were killed in the fighting, which ended with the city of Constantinople laying in ruins.

Justinian was determined to rebuild the city on a grand scale and put huge sums of money into public works. Soon, Constantinople had new bridges, public baths, parks, roads, and hospitals. The emperor also built many grand churches, including the magnificent Hagia Sophia, which is Greek for “Holy Wisdom.” Today, this great structure is one of the most famous buildings in the world.

Besides rebuilding Constantinople, Justinian tried to reclaim some of the Roman Empire’s lost territory. He launched military campaigns that, for Justinian is most famous, however, for creating a systematic body of law. Under his direction, a committee studied the thousands of laws the Byzantines had inherited from the Roman Empire. They revised outdated and confusing laws. They also made improvements, such as extending women’s property rights. The result of their work is known as Justinian’s Code, which became the basis for many legal codes in the western world.

Procopius, the court historian, wrote glowing accounts of Justinian’s achievements. But he also wrote the Secret History, in which he called the emperor “a treacherous enemy, insane for murder and plunder.” Throughout Byzantine history, distrust and divisions often plagued the imperial court, and Justinian’s court was no exception.

3. The Eastern Orthodox Church

To the Byzantines, Christianity was more than a religion. It was the very foundation of their empire. When Constantine built his new capital, he intended it to be the religious center of the empire, as well as the seat of government. Constantine himself tried to settle religious disputes by assembling a council of bishops.
Hagia Sophia was built between the years 532 and 537. Its architectural features inspired the design of many later Orthodox churches.

Over time, the Byzantine Church separated from the Church in Rome and became known as the Eastern Orthodox Church. The word orthodox means “in agreement with right belief.” The leaders of the medieval Eastern Orthodox Church thought that their church was based on a set of beliefs that they could trace back to Jesus Christ and to the work of bishops in early Christian councils.

The Role of the Eastern Orthodox Church in the Empire

Religion and government were more closely linked in the Byzantine Empire than in the west. The Byzantines viewed the emperor not just as the head of the government but as the living representative of God and Jesus Christ. This meant that church and state were combined into one body.

The state religion also united people in a common belief. The Eastern Orthodox Church played a central role in daily life. Most people attended church regularly. Religious sacraments gave shape to every stage of the journey from birth to death. Monasteries and convents cared for the poor and the sick. These institutions were supported by wealthy people and became quite powerful.
Church Hierarchy  Like Roman Catholic clergy, Orthodox clergy were ranked in order of importance. In Byzantine times, the emperor had supreme authority in the Church. He selected the patriarch of Constantinople, who ranked just below him in matters of religion.

Unlike the pope in the west, the patriarch did not claim strong authority over other patriarchs and bishops. Instead, he was “first among equals.” The patriarch of Constantinople (modern Istanbul, Turkey) still holds this honor.

Orthodox priests served under patriarchs and other bishops. Unlike Roman Catholic priests, many Orthodox priests were allowed to marry. Bishops, however, could rise only from the ranks of unmarried clergy.

Liturgy and Prayer  The Orthodox Church service corresponding to the Roman Catholic mass was the Divine Liturgy. Both the clergy and worshippers sang or chanted the liturgy, or form of public worship. The liturgy was conducted in Greek or in the local language.

Orthodox Christians also prayed to saints, two of whom were particularly important. Saint Basil promoted charity and reformed the liturgy. Saint Cyril helped create the Cyrillic alphabet, which allowed scholars to translate the Bible for people in eastern Europe.

A feature of Eastern Orthodox churches is an image of Christ the Pantocrator, like this one, watching over Orthodox worshippers from the dome above. Images such as this one demonstrate the importance of art and beauty in Orthodox Church practices.
Architecture and Art  Christian faith inspired magnificent architecture and artwork in the Byzantine Empire. With its square base and high dome, the cathedral Hagia Sophia served as a model for many Orthodox churches. The architecture of the church also reflects Orthodox views. The simple base represents the earthly world, and the “dome of heaven” rests on top of it. Rich decorations on the inside were meant to remind worshippers of what it would be like to enter God’s kingdom.

Building on the Greek love of art, the Orthodox Church used many images in its services and prayers. Byzantine artists created beautiful icons, which were usually painted on small wooden panels. Artists also fashioned sacred images as mosaics and painted them in murals.

An image of Christ as the Pantocrator, or ruler of all, gazed down from the domes of all Orthodox churches. Most churches also displayed an icon of Jesus’s mother, Mary (called the Theotokos, or god-bearer) and the Christ child over the altar.

Many Byzantines believed that sacred pictures brought them closer to God. But later, icons also became a source of violent disagreement.

4. Conflict Between East and West

Medieval Europe and the Byzantine Empire were united in a single faith, Christianity. Over the centuries, however, cultural, political, and religious differences led to conflict between the two parts of the old Roman Empire.

The two regions had been quite different even in the days of the early Roman emperors. The eastern half of the empire had many cities, much trade, and great wealth. The western half was mostly rural and agricultural, and not nearly as wealthy.

Other differences became more pronounced after the fall of Rome. Byzantine culture was largely shaped by its Greek heritage, whereas the west was influenced by Frankish and Germanic cultures. In the city of Constantinople, people spoke Greek. In the west, Latin was the language of scholars, diplomats, and the Church.

Perhaps most important was the conflict that developed between the churches of east and west. After the fall of Rome, popes gradually emerged as powerful figures in western Europe. The popes claimed supreme religious authority over all Christians. The emperors and patriarchs of the east did not claim that power.

Other differences added to the conflict. Three major disagreements in particular led to a split in the Christian Church.

Iconoclasm The first major disagreement concerned religious icons. Many Christians had icons of Jesus, Mary, and the saints, seeing them as symbols of the spiritual world, or “windows into heaven.” Some Christians in the east, however, believed that people were wrongly worshipping the icons as if they were divine. In 730 C.E., Byzantine emperor Leo III banned the use of religious images in all Christian churches and homes.

Byzantine emperor Leo III banned the use of religious images, or icons, in 730 C.E. The ban was lifted in 843. This mosaic of Jesus in Hagia Sophia escaped destruction because it was created after the ban was lifted.

This policy of iconoclasm (“icon smashing”) led to the destruction of religious art. Throughout Christian lands, people cried out in protest. In Rome, Roman Church leaders were angry because Leo’s order applied to parts of Italy that were under Byzantine control. Pope Gregory III even excommunicated the emperor. The Byzantine Empire lifted its ban on icons in 843, but the dispute over iconoclasm had caused a major split between the east and west. It also helped motivate popes in Rome to look for support and protection against enemies.

The division between the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches lasted until 1964. In that year, Patriarch Athenagoras (left) and Pope Paul VI (right) met in Jerusalem and made a formal statement that undid the excommunications of 1054.

The Crowning of a Holy Roman Emperor Another major disagreement occurred in 800 C.E., a time when Empress Irene ruled the Byzantine Empire. Because she was a woman, Pope Leo III did not view her as honorable or strong enough to govern. He wanted the protection of a strong male leader to help defend the Church in the west.

Instead, Leo decided to crown Charlemagne, the king of the Franks, as Holy Roman emperor. The pope’s action outraged the Byzantines, who acknowledged their empress as the rightful ruler of the Roman Empire.
The Final Break  Matters between east and west came to a head in 1054 when Cerularius, the patriarch of Constantinople, wanted to reassert Byzantine control of the Church. He closed all churches that worshipped with western rites. Furious, Pope Leo IX excommunicated Cerularius.

Cerularius responded by excommunicating the cardinal. This was purely a symbolic act, for the patriarch did not have that power. But it showed that the schism, or split, between east and west was complete. Despite future attempts to heal the division, the Great Schism left the Eastern Orthodox Church and the Roman Catholic Church as separate churches.

Summary

In this lesson, you learned about the founding of the Byzantine Empire and the Eastern Orthodox Church.

Cultural Interaction  The largely Greek culture of the Byzantine Empire was influenced by the European and Asian cultures it encountered through trade. The Eastern Orthodox Church had a tremendous influence on everyday life and inspired magnificent art forms—domed churches like the Hagia Sophia, painted icons, and mosaics. In the 700s, however, conflict arose with the western church over the use of icons.

Political Structures  Church and state were combined in the Byzantine Empire. The emperor was also the head of the Eastern Church and was viewed as the representative of God on earth. In the 500s the emperor Justinian reformed the laws of the empire by creating a systematic body of law, known as Justinian’s Code. It became a foundation for the law of the western world.

Economic Structures  Extensive trade made the Byzantine Empire wealthy. Luxury goods such as ivory, silk, furs, and perfumes were especially important. The Byzantine Empire at this time was relatively wealthy and urban compared to western Europe, which was much poorer and more rural.

Social Structures  A small minority in the Byzantine Empire became fabulously wealthy from trade, but a majority remained poor. In Constantinople hospitals, homes for the elderly, and orphanages provided social services for the poor.

Human-Environment Interaction  Constantinople became a wealthy and prosperous city in part due to its central location at the crossroads of trading routes between Europe and Asia.
